

Employment Standards vs. Collective Agreements – Ask The Expert

Employment standards legislation across Canada is designed to establish minimum workplace rights.

However, provinces differ in how these minimums interact with collective agreements, particularly when union contract language covers the same topics as employment standards.

QUESTION

In British Columbia, Employment Standards provides guidance that some ESA provisions may be displaced by collective agreement language (e.g., overtime, vacation, statutory holidays, termination and layoff). We were told Alberta does not operate this way and that employment standards always apply as the minimum even in unionized workplaces. How do other provinces handle this?

ANSWER

Across Canada, employment standards legislation generally sets minimum conditions that cannot be negotiated away, even through a collective agreement. Most provinces treat employment standards as a legal “floor” that always applies. British Columbia is a notable exception, because parts of the ESA may be displaced when the collective agreement provides equal or better terms.

EXPLANATION

In most provinces (and federally), employment standards establish minimum rights related to wages, hours of work, overtime, vacation, statutory holidays, and termination. Employers and unions can negotiate better provisions, but clauses that provide less than the statutory minimum are typically unenforceable. Alberta reflects this common model: employment standards apply to unionized and non-unionized employees alike, and collective agreement language cannot override the Code’s minimum protections.

Ontario and Québec generally operate the same way, treating employment standards as mandatory minimum entitlements regardless of collective agreement terms. British Columbia differs because its ESA allows certain sections to be replaced by collective agreement provisions when those provisions meet or exceed ESA requirements. When that occurs, the Employment Standards Branch has no jurisdiction and disputes must be resolved through grievance and arbitration.