

How to Manage Road Rage to Stay Healthier and Safer

With more and more people in the world and in the workforce, roads are becoming increasingly crowded. Inside our metal boxes, we're not always as polite as we would be to one another face-to-face, and when we're all frustrated with traffic, sometimes people make mistakes or pull impolite driving maneuvers, which can lead to anger from other frustrated drivers. This often results in road rage, which can pose a significant threat to health and safety for everyone on the road.

People experiencing road rage may be face increased health risks that come from high levels of stress, tension and anger. These episodes of acute stress may become chronic stress, which leads to many negative health outcomes.

In addition to the toll stress takes on the "rager's" body, the increased risk of a car accident due to road rage puts all drivers at risk.

By being a courteous and defensive driver, you can cut down the level of frustration you might cause other drivers, doing your part in keeping road rage at bay. But if you yourself experience road rage, here are some techniques you can use to stay calm in the car:

- Breathe: Breathing exercises can help you cleanse your body of stagnant air and stale energy, getting your blood more oxygenated and, of course, releasing tension. Focusing on your breathing brings your attention inward and makes frustrations seem more removed, without taking your focus too far away from the road.
- Listen: Listen to music or audio books. Music can subtly color your experiences, adding an exciting soundtrack to your commute. Audio books can supply you with a mild distraction that can make your drive enjoyable enough that you find annoying drivers and bumper-to-bumper traffic less frustrating.
- Relax: Practice Progressive Muscle Relaxation \(PMR\) and Deep Muscle Relaxation \(DMR\). When you're frustrated, you store the tension in your body. These techniques will help you learn to quickly release the tension you're carrying, even as you sit in the car, which will help you feel more physically and emotionally relaxed.
- Play: Use cognitive-behavioral interventions like Counting Idiots. Basically, if you accept that a certain amount of people are going to make fools of themselves on the road, and decide to make a game out of counting them, you can cut down on the stress you feel in response to their rude maneuvers.

- Plan: Manage your time wisely. Often, when we're frustrated on the road, it's because we're in a hurry and can't get there quickly enough because of traffic. Organizing your schedule so you can leave earlier, and planning for traffic, can leave you feeling more relaxed because it really won't matter as much if the trip takes a few extra minutes.

Experiment with these techniques and others from The Tension Tamers Section, and you should find your driving time to be more pleasurable, and your commutes safer.