

Legal Restrictions on Employing Young Workers – Know The Laws Of Your Province

Companies that hire or allow students and other young workers to perform work must comply with the special requirements governing the employment of persons under 18 years of age. Such rules are typically contained in the province or territory's:

- Employment or labour standards laws.
- Occupational health and safety (OHS) laws.
- In some jurisdictions, including Prince Edward Island and Nunavut, separate laws that specifically address youth employment.

While the specific rules vary by jurisdiction, they typically include:

- A general rule banning employment for work that may be reasonably expected to harm a young person's health, safety, or general welfare.
- Employment standards restrictions on the number of hours and windows during which young workers are allowed to work, especially when school is in session.
- Safety-based restrictions that bar individuals of certain ages from working in dangerous occupations like construction or mining and/or limiting them to the specific work or jobs expressly listed in the regulations.
- The requirement that the employer get written consent from the young worker's parent or guardian and, in some cases, approval from the government.
- In Manitoba and Saskatchewan, young workers must provide the employer a written certificate of having completed work readiness course.

British Columbia has the most detailed and stringent young worker laws of any jurisdiction; Yukon has the least restrictive rules. Here's a breakdown of the requirements in each part of Canada so you'll be prepared to comply no matter where in the country you operate.
