Health and safety inspectors don't only arrive after an incident or to resolve an issue that has brought them to the workplace. They can and do arrive unannounced to conduct surprise inspections of the workplace. Inspectors can arrive with their own agendas and have difficult personalities. They can issue onerous orders and directions to employers and other workplace parties. So employers should be prepared for such inspections—before they happen—in order to ensure that they're properly managed.

In this webinar, Jeremy Warning, a former Ontario Ministry of Labour prosecutor, will discuss the inspection process, the issues that can arise from such inspections and best practices for managing them.

Topics to be addressed include:

- Understanding the powers of the OHS inspector when conducting a surprise inspection;
- An employer's rights during a surprise inspection;
- The remedial powers of an OHS inspector;
- Setting the stage for success;
- Managing the heavy-handed inspector or over-zealous worker; and
- Appealing orders and directions without repercussions.

There will also be a Q&A session at the end in which you can ask your own questions about handling OHS inspectors.
